General Information

Overview

This unit introduces you to the important role of communication in nursing practice and strategies to effectively communicate as a nurse. You will explore types of communication and communication strategies that are relevant to different health contexts, including mental health. Oral, electronic, and written communication skills, including effective listening, therapeutic relationships, and the importance of cultural and diversity awareness when undertaking care, will be explained in this unit. In particular, you will examine your own strengths in communication and how you can utilise these to manage future clinical challenges. Throughout this unit, you will review the relationship between communication and professional conduct, reflecting on key components and considerations in nursing communication within the interdisciplinary health care team.

Previous Student Feedback

Feedback, Recommendations and Responses

Every unit is reviewed for enhancement each year. At the most recent review, the following staff and student feedback items were identified and recommendations were made.

Feedback from SUTE Data

Feedback

Unclear unit requirements.

Recommendation

Revise group work requirements and introduce group work at the beginning of term as offered previously. Revised Unit Introduction Information to insure clarity.

Feedback from Emails

Feedback

Students reported value in working in groups

Recommendation

Continue to include group work within the unit to facilitate engagement with learning material.

Feedback from Emails

Feedback

Students felt staff allocating group meant mismatch of personalities and time allocation towards study made it difficult to form studying relationships.

Recommendation

Reconsider students self allocating based on connections and their own study habits.
