General Information

Overview

This unit will give you an introduction to the field of environmental health and the practices currently in use to manage large-scale public health initiatives in areas like water quality, solid waste management, air pollution, food safety, and management of hazardous materials. The unit also covers health impacts from the natural environment, such as vector control and control of zoonoses. Additionally, you will gain familiarity with the laws and regulations that apply in maintaining a healthy living environment at the population level and come to understand the role of governments at various levels in ensuring the public's health and safety.
